Caroline Verney was a research student at the University of Exeter. Her doctoral thesis on farming practices in Victorian North Devon was nearing completion at the time of her death. Her colleague, Dr Janet Few, undertook to develop Verney's work so that it could be presented to a wider audience.

Jonathan Healey is Lecturer in Local and Social History at Oxford University, and a Fellow of Kellogg College. He works on early-modern English social history, particularly focusing on poverty, famine, and 'everyday politics', as well as the history of upland communities. He is shortly to take over as editor of Local Population Studies.

Audrey Perkyns is a retired teacher, formerly of Rainham in Kent but now living in Northumberland. She has been a regular contributor to LPS over the years, and retains an active interest in nineteenth-century Kentish demographic and social history.

Michael Saxby spent most of his scientific career in the food industry, latterly as the manager of an international laboratory serving companies in the UK and abroad. After retirement he studied at Birkbeck College for the Certificate and Diploma in Family History.

Samantha Williams is Senior Lecturer in Local and Regional History at the Institute of Continuing Education and Bye Fellow in History at Girton College, University of Cambridge. She is author of Poverty, gender and life-cycle under the English poor law, 1760–1834 (Woodbridge, 2011) and a number of articles on poverty and medical provision under the old poor law and on unmarried motherhood in London. She is currently writing a book on unmarried mothers in London 1722–1867.
